OVERVIEW

Each year, horse trainers journey to Reno, Nevada to vie for one of the most challenging equestrian championships in the world. For the trainers, winning means putting food on the table and hay in the barn for another year, and a chance for a more secure future. For the world, it means another year of survival for a culture at risk and the continued refinement of an art that dates back to the first missions in California. It was an art born out of a practical need for partnership, but the bond between horse and human and the community that grew around that bond are so strong that, defying the odds, it has not been broken—not even by the force of a modern world. Down the Fence profiles three horse trainers on their journey to compete for the championship, revealing their challenges and a rare glimpse into their unique lifestyle...
